

INSTITUTE FOR LAW AND ECONOMICS

Professor Saul Levmore taught "Property and Public Choice" at the 2012 Summer School.

The University of Chicago is the birthplace of "law and economics," and it continues to be the international center for the study of this interdisciplinary field. At the University of Chicago, such brilliant minds as Richard Posner and Nobel laureates Gary Becker, Ronald Coase, and George Stigler have worked together for more than 50 years to change the foundation of legal analysis. Entire fields of law—antitrust, tort, contracts, corporate, and property law—have been completely transformed by law and economics, and nearly every area of law has been affected by it. Law and economics is in every law class and casebook in America, and its tools are used all over the world.

Judge Richard Posner talked with 2012 Summer School scholars after his lecture.

“The work of our law and economics faculty has always been useful in real-world situations, but that is more true now than it has ever been. The Law School will make sure that the production of knowledge that takes place in Hyde Park has an impact far beyond the borders of our neighborhood and indeed our nation.”

Michael H. Schill
Dean and Harry N. Wyatt Professor of Law

The Program for the 2013 Summer School will have five subject units. Each unit will include five lectures, all in English. Required reading materials in English will be distributed about 60 days in advance of the program. Lectures will be delivered by some of UChicago's most prominent faculty in the Institute for Law and Economics. The program will also invite some participants to discuss their own work in colloquium sessions with UChicago faculty moderators.

Dr. [Name] is an expert in criminal law and empirical law and economics. He holds a PhD in economics from the University

